

The Constitution Project's Task Force on Detainee Treatment

The Constitution Project's independent, bipartisan, blue-ribbon Task Force is examining the federal government's policies and actions related to the capture, detention and prosecution of suspected terrorists in U.S. custody during the Clinton, Bush and Obama administrations. Created late in 2010, the goal of the Task Force is to provide the American people with a broad understanding of what is known—and what may still be unknown—about the past and current treatment of suspected terrorists detained by the U.S. government. The Task Force seeks to identify and promote detention policies and practices that comply with the nation's legal obligations, foreign policy objectives and values.

The Task Force expects its work will include: a thorough review of the laws that govern detainee treatment; a comprehensive description of the details regarding U.S. treatment of detainees at multiple facilities over the last twenty years; identification of critical issues for which information has not yet been made available; an assessment and discussion of the underlying policy decisions that may have resulted in any mistreatment of detainees, and an analysis of the consequences of those policies; and, any findings and recommendations.

As Asa Hutchinson, a Task Force Co-Chair, former Congressman (R-AR) and an Undersecretary of the Department of Homeland Security during the George W. Bush administration, remarked when the Task Force was created: "This is a national security issue. We are still facing a real threat from terrorists and others who don't trust or like us. It is in all of our interests to discover the truth, so that we can deal with the accusations, make whatever reforms may be needed, and strengthen America's credibility on the world stage."
